All in the Family: Allison Moorer, Shelby Lynne and Little Silver Sing With Kin

Somewhere You Found My Name

Little Silver isn't yet on the same plane as Moorer and Lynne, but they're a family band as well —of the husband and wife variety. They live in Brooklyn, New York, and have two young daughters. If they don't seem too keen on touring behind their debut album, Somewhere You Found My Name, you can probably blame those tykes. But don't wait for them to come to your town; just buy the darn record.

Mates of State are the obvious comparison for this pair, who specialize in harmonious indie-pop (insofar as indie-pop is a genre and not an oxymoron). But, in keeping with the familial theme, you'd then have to cross-breed them with Everything But the Girl, Aimee Mann and Michael Penn. Little Silver has a couple of sidemen, and once they emerge from the trancelike perfection of the album's first two tracks—"Longest Day of the Year" is a more Gotham-tinged "Only Living Boy in New York" for the twenty-teens—they and their band rock out, resulting in a surprisingly jammy blast.
